FROWNING FANNIE.

ANNIE would have been a pretty child but for the frown always on her face, and this was caused by a selfish disposition, discontented no matter what was done for her pleasure. The widowed mother tried all in her power to make the child happy, but like all selfish people, the more that was done for her, the more she expected.

Every day she would come home with tales of what beautiful homes, lovely dresses, and fine trips her playmates had, while she wore only plain gowns and remained in the city all summer. It never occurred to her to think of how many were worse off than she in her comfortable home with her kind mother.

bles before which stood several horses being groomed.

To Fannie all of this luxury looked very enticing. How she longed to have a home like this with flowers, and horses. And as she stood with her frowning little face pressed against the iron fence, a dainty pony cart came down the driveway. The pony was a beautiful black with shaggy mane and heavy tail, driven by a groom in livery, while in the black seat sat a child whose face was pale with suffering. The cart stopped at the gate and the child spoke to Fannie, who was looking longingly at the flowers.

"Would you like to have some of the roses?" she asked in a weak voice. Fannie was too delighted to reply, but the groom gathered a big bunch and gave her.

"Oh," exclaimed Fannie, "these are perfectly lovely. I wave tust thinking proposed.

"No," laughed Fannie, "not a lesson at school, but one out of it."
"Here is a little present for you, child," continued the old lady. "It was given me by a gentleman who has a child," continued the old lady, "It was given me by a gentleman who has a large store. You can use it better than I." And Fannie opened the pagkage handed her to find in it a pretty blue dress just her size.

So Fannie got her new dress, and, best of all, a lesson which changed her frowns into smiles and made her do all she could to make her own home a happy one, even if humble.
